

The Georgetown Heckler

Vol. 3, No. 10, 3/2005

Judge Judy Sentences Man to Death

On Monday, Fox announced the relocation of its hit courtroom series, Judge Judy, from weekdays at 4 pm to the coveted 9 pm time slot. This decision followed a controversial ruling on last Thursday's show when Judge Judy sentenced a Los Angeles resident to death.

Jermaine Wilson, 36, was brought to court by Wanda Little, 42, after he allegedly rear-ended her 1989 Toyota Corolla while attempting to park outside a local Dunkin' Donuts. Wilson is said to have fled the scene without leaving a note, but, according to authorities, DNA tests performed on hair samples found outside the store have yielded a positive identification. Little sued Wilson for $900 (the estimated cost of her vehicle + mechanic's fees) and $10,000 for pain and suffering.

Judge Judy sided with the plaintiff, but originally decided that Wilson would only be responsible for paying $900, rather than the full $10,900. She expected Wilson's relief upon hearing the verdict, but was instead met with contempt.

In a fiery outburst, Wilson berated Judge Judy, hurling bitter insults such as "dumb judge" and "stupid lady" in her direction. This was too much for Fox's no-nonsense judge to take, and in a surprising twist of events, Judge Judy sentenced Wilson to death. Shock seized the courtroom as the show went to commercial break.

Fox executives were initially horrified by Judge Judy's extreme sentence, but their misgivings soon gave way to approval as the ratings began to roll in. Viewership for Friday's episode (the day following the death sentence) more than quadrupled! Harold Couch, 62, a devoted fan of Judge Judy, responded positively to the sentence: "I think she made the right move," Couch said. "It's high time we get scum like [Wilson] off the streets!"

The surge in ratings and the expanded fan-base has led Fox entertainment executive, Sandy McKaw, to uphold Wilson's sentence: "The viewers have spoken. Wilson chose a life of crime, and now he has to do the time." McKaw also announced Judge Judy's new prime time location, a move that was necessary due to the show's new "edgy" format. Wilson plans to appeal Judge Judy's decision, but in the meantime, Fox has given her official permission to continue to apply the death sentence as she sees fit.

Living Wage Coalition Commits Mass Suicide, 26 dead

By Jim Jones, Special to the Heckler

After a failed hunger strike caused University officials to call the Living Wage Coalition "bullshit," 26 members of the embattled social action group killed themselves in Red Square today.

Passers by noticed the motionless bodies under the LWC tent and smelled something that resembled cyanide, but assumed it was just another of the group's "death of immigrant workers" protests, or "die-ins."

"I mean, those hippies have always smelled weird," Cammy Windsor (COL 07) said. "I had no idea they were dead."

An LWC member who forgot to lace his Coke with the lethal chemical lauded his fellow group members. "I mean, they wanted to give the workers a better life, so they did what it takes. You gotta respect that, dude."

A note found on the group's leader provided LWC's motive: "We, the members of Georgetown University's Living Wage Coalition, want everyone to know that we mean it when we say 'we are prepared to go all the way.'"

Some thought we were bluffing with the hunger-strike thing, but we wanted to show that we are not just liberal sissies."

The University declined comment, but issued the following brief statement: "We won," yesterday's widely-circled memorandum said.

Ernesto Garcia, a facilities worker, was unhappy. "I mean we were thinking about joining the union but they [LWC leaders] told us we didn't know what we needed." "I think we messed up their hunger strike, too. I dropped off some pizzas that were left in ICC, they went crazy."

Another student group, Campaign for the Ethical Treatment of Campus Wildlife (CETCW) now feels pressure to "step our shit up," according to Marcus Wilmore (SFS '06), a group board member. "We hope we can live up to the example that was set by LWC," he said. "We are considering a motion to cut off a group member's finger every time there is an incident of cruelty toward our animal brothers and sisters on campus Anything less would be insincere to the cause," he said.

Again, University comment was to the point. "Bring it on," officials said.

The Corp to Launch New Space Program

By Uncle Jesse

Forty years after the world's first moon walk, Students of Georgetown, Inc., better known as The Corp, has announced that it will open a new student Space Program service. This will be the Corp's first major venture outside of basic on campus retail and is expected to drive the company well into bankruptcy within six weeks.

Founded in 1972 by pot smoking hippies, the Corp has grown from an anti-war juice stand into a mostly legitimate organization currently known for groceries, coffee, and movies. After rebounding from several fiscally miserable years, the Corp has turned significant profit over the last 3 years and has subsequently decided to squander the money in record fashion.

Originally pitched as a joke over bottles of Pelegrino Water at the Tombs on St. Patrick's Day, Irishman Seamus O'Malley's plan to purchase, renovate, and eventually launch a space shuttle has gained a surprising amount of support from Corp management. CEO Jon Carpenter released a statement saying, "The Corp has always wanted to do something absolutely absurd and we can think of nothing more pointless than trying to put a student in space."

Initial plans are for Corp employees—largely greedy business school students with no science background—to do the actual work on the shuttles, build the launch pad, set up the flight plans, and man the control center. Ironically, the control center is slated to be put in the currently unused hole that was formerly Full Exposure, the Corp's most recent success story.

Many questions are being raised about the logistics of a student-run space launch. The first and most glaring is the financial gap between the Corp's modestly large budget and the billions of dollars needed for such a program. Other critics are choosing to focus on the safety issues confronting a group of drunken cashiers building and then manning a space shuttle. President Jack DeGioia commented that, "As much as the Corp contributes to our campus, I wouldn't trust them on a Saturday night to build and maintain a bicycle." It should be noted that President DeGioia was the only university employee with enough free time to answer calls from the Heckler, seemingly in a desperate attempt to ignore numerous starving students in the “free speech zone.”

Despite a gross lack of materials, financing, know-how, and sobriety, the Corp intends to move forward with the project. In the words of CEO Carpenter, “Oh, we’ll hit Mars by 2007. And if all this fails, I’ll still graduate, go into the real world, and be your boss in 2 years.”

SFS Faculty, Students Masturbate to Sound of Own Voice

By Cornelius Salisbury

A survey of students and faculty at Georgetown’s prestigious School of Foreign Service yielded obvious results last week, when it was revealed that an overwhelming majority of those enrolled in the SFS questioned masturbated to the sound of their own voice. It has been widely speculated for years that SFS personal receive sexual pleasure from foreign-language pornography, intercultural gangbangs and Map of the Modern World, but the recent revelations of autoerotic fornication comes as a new addition to an eclectic and growing list of masturbatory material appealing to SFS students and faculty.

Anne O’Toole (SFS 07) explained that, “it’s not so much the sound of my own voice that gets me off, but the knowledge that contained in my own voice is more wisdom than any one person should be privy to. I’m not thinking about my words when I touch myself, but rather the ramifications of global warming on nomadic tribes in Tibet. That, and how fucking hot I am.”

Dean Bergman, longtime SFS staffer, understands that, “while students in the SFS are normal human beings just like Al Paccino or Ralph Malph, they’re far more gifted and have truly earned the right to talk themselves off into a wild and steamy UN-related climax. You’d be amazed how fulfilling it can be to hear your own dangerously intelligent voice tell you you’re sexy. My wife, she’s not bad. But when I need a quickie, I play a tape recording of a lecture I gave in 1993 on tax reforms in the former Ukraine and beat myself into transnational oblivion.”

While most college students view pornography or participate in sexual activities, SFS students rarely take part in interpersonal physical activity. “We’re not asexual; we just know that no one else can live up to our own astoundingly high expectations” explained Sloven Darjarian. “Except Madeleine Albright. She could pork me any day, except she’s way too fat, her clip on penis is rusty, and I hear she has a pirate leg.”

Not surprisingly, a much higher percent of SFS students and faculty are virgins, as compared to their non-SFS contemporaries. Asked why he had never had sex before, Prof. Antonio Oley defended his virginity. “I may be 54, unmarried and a virgin, but at least I know where the French Overseas Department of Guadelu is located, and that’s more erection than any one man knows what to do with. It damn near made my sex fall off. Poor frat boy bastards with their women and their beer don’t know what they’re missing.”

The Georgetown Heckler
Sticking It To The Man Since 2003